Alex Honnold, the famous free solo climber, visited Taiwan to try a new challenge. This time, he decided to climb Taipei 101, one of the tallest buildings in the world, without using any ropes or safety equipment. Just like when he climbs rocks, this kind of climbing is very dangerous.

Before the climb, Alex spent a lot of time preparing. He studied the building carefully and imagined every movement in his mind. He also walked around the area to check the walls and find the best places to hold and step. Even though Taipei 101 is very different from natural rocks, careful planning and focus are still very important.

On the day of the climb, many people watched him from the ground. Alex moved slowly and carefully, making sure every hand and foot was in the right place. His strong body and calm mind helped him stay focused. The climb was difficult and took a long time, but Alex finally reached the top safely.

Alex said that climbing Taipei 101 was very different from climbing natural rocks, but the key to success was the same: careful planning, confidence, and focus. Many people were inspired by his courage and skill. His visit to Taiwan showed that with practice and determination, people can face new challenges bravely, no matter where they are.
